In older adults their questions about that , patient percentage abuse disorder , a question of types of morphine and I think that was a good point that there could be consideration for using a topical form of morphine which is only approved for pain and certainly could've been appropriate for patient that I presented. It often does require prior authorization and some plans that older adults have, cheat sheets show options, and split doses certainly useful , for analgesic given two or three times a day, not once a day. Patients will see analgesic effects. As allergies ache agent prior to using opioid use disorder so we can use the preferential form in the hospital as well, especially back in the 90s when we had patients coming with withdrawal as well as complications of injection drug use causing pain or print for preferential form. And analgesic is known , veterinarians use morphine, there's a call for consideration that perhaps it should be the first line opioid as we consider and opioid in treatment for pain.

A lot of comments were related to socialization is key in older adults and that isolation is often a norm and thus a important thing to address.

There was a question about medication for older adults and I'll just touch on the thought of medication for older adults. Some have not been well studied. There's a study in which the end is really small but is certainly be effective in a could certainly could be considered for older adults as well as other medication, older adults are likely to be on other medications and drug interactions are possibility of sedation. It is much more likely to have sedating effects for older adults because they might possibly be on other sedation medications. Older adults have features like anxiety , an example of using cannabis that may be of you that is common in younger adults that cannabis can help with anxiety but paradoxically it is a not unusual to see it actually increase anxiety. There is no really good studies of different formulations of cannabis products whether it be CBD Euler cannabis dispensary in older adults . Without a doubt the use of cannabis has taken off, especially in states where decriminalization has happened, legalization and use has happened as well. If you're in a state where there is recreational use of cannabis as legal, it should open a conversation as to whether or not cannabis is being used, much the same way it would be alcohol being used for medicating for sleeper anxiety. Those are all important points. The need for discussion into cannabis needs to increase for older adults in a couple of years.
